

Trusts

By executing a trust agreement, a person referred to as a “grantor” establishes a legal relationship between his or her property and a trustee. The trustee is usually charged with managing this trust property for someone’s benefit, such as that of the grantor, or another party. Grantors make trusts for a variety of reasons, such as tax savings, charitable giving, Medicaid eligibility, or to support a spouse, child, or grandchild. Trusts also come in many forms. For example, “inter vivos” trusts are established during the lifetime of the grantor while testamentary trusts are established after his or her death. Revocable trusts can be altered or cancelled after being established while irrevocable trusts cannot be changed. How We Can Help
